

Executive Summary

Inside the School 20-Minute Trainer: *Filtering: The Requirements and the Classroom

When school districts decide what to filter on their computers, or what websites and electronic material to “screen out,” it can be controversial. Some educators find most Internet material obnoxious and prefer almost everything blocked and some teachers find the filters annoying and counterproductive to their teaching.

Whatever your personal feelings are, the fact remains: school district computers must have filters.

Inside the School’s 20-Minute Trainer, *Filtering: The Requirements and the Classroom, will review how filters impact education and what schools can do in conjunction with the filtering that is already in place. The presenter will also give tips for teachers to give to parents about filtering Internet content at home.

After viewing the 20-Minute Trainer you will be able to identify:

- CIPA and Erate
- Filtering requirements
- How filtering affects student education
- Overrides versus bypasses
- ‘Teachable moments’ for educators and parents

About the Presenter:

Mike Donlin has been an educator for decades. He has taught English Language Arts and English as a Second Language at all levels and in different locations around the country and the world. Donlin started with Seattle Public Schools in 1980 as a classroom teacher. Since that time, he has taught, trained and supervised a variety of programs from TBE/ESL to technology and bullying and harassment prevention and intervention. As a program administrator, he managed federal and state grant programs, including a Federal Technology Innovation Challenge Grant, Community Technology Center grants, and Title IID E2T2 technology grants. In Seattle’s Prevention-Intervention program, Mike implemented bullying prevention programs with an emphasis on Internet safety and cyberbullying. He oversaw the development of a Middle School Cyberbullying Curriculum. In 2008, he received a Qwest/NCMEC Spirit of Online Safety Leadership Award, and is currently a member of the National Cyber Security Alliance K-12 Work Group and an alumnus of the FBI Citizens' Academy. Mike is married and has three digital native children.
